The three bars you'll be hearing over and over again are the 'Wait' bar, the 'Defend' bar and the 'Start' bar. wait - the bar will go up as long as the monsters aren't hitting your HP. defend - you'll be hearing this when the monsters start to attack you. start - you'll be hearing this once you have the required 'experience' to start the level. The Wait bar will go down by itself as long as you are successful in defending the level. The Defend bar is fully dependant on the damage you take and will go up as you take damage. If your HP are low, the Defend bar will stay below the amount of HP you have and you can't continue. Once the start bar gets up, it will not go down and it will continue to count until you have defeated the boss or die. In other words: if you don't finish the level, the bar will stay above zero and you can play again. You will keep getting experience as long as the bar is above zero. There is no upper limit to the amount of experience you can get for a level, but if you kill the boss you won't get any experience from it. Current Level Conditions The current level conditions are displayed in the top right corner of the game. You can find your level by double clicking the level bar.*You can turn off the conditions by double clicking the [?] button.*You can see your current experience points by double clicking the [?] button. Time The Time bar will increase as you play the level. As you gain experience, the Time bar will slow down to reflect this. HP The HP bar represents your HP. It goes down if you take damage or get hit by a monster. When it gets down to zero, you will be dropped from the game. Exp The Exp bar will increase if you continue to get experience. The speed at which it increases is dependant on the level condition. Monster The Monster bar will increase as you defeat monsters. It will also increase as you continue to get experience from a level. Helpful Tips Once you start a new game, there is a level you'll have to finish before you'll be able

x 10 In late June, I upgraded my Buster Rival's bird guns to autoloaders with the apparent intention to take advantage of the larger round capacity. However, I didn't have enough room on my ammo box, so I didn't have any more than 10 rounds of any of the .30 caliber ammo out on the range, same as always. No problem, I thought, I'll just change out my Kimber Custom Carry II's hammer to a Taurus Embassy XT trigger. I took the guns out to the range and started off with a couple of army assaults just to get a feel for them. I loaded the rifle with .38 Special primers and had a 50 round box of 9 mm +p rounds on the benchrest. I took four 9 mm rounds out to the range and shot at several targets. The gun groups were good and were of an average size. I was pleased, so I loaded the other two rifles again with .38 Special and the same military ammo and shot them. The Taurus XT trigger performed just as I had hoped it would and the elevation and line of sight were easy to manipulate. I was shooting both rifles back-to-back for each round, each with the lights off and no laser. Both of the firearms performed exactly as expected: easy to manipulate, easy to hold, easy to sight in, smooth reliable operation and standard deviation lines of 5-6 inches. Now I was confident, so I took everything out to the range for the purpose of only looping the double-load of 9mm and switching from the 45 ACP factory ammo. I put together two boxes of 10 rounds of 9mm, one loaded with 115 grain JSP bullets and the other loaded with 124 grain JHP bullets. I loaded the rifle with the 115 grain rounds and came to the range with all 10 rounds of the combination loaded. The group size at 100 yards was no different than with the military 50 round short boxes, more or less of the same size grouping, with a standard deviation of about 8 inches. This still meant I was shooting half of the maximal effective range on every range visit. So it was time to change the type of ammo again. I took these last two boxes of JHP .38 Special military ammo, repacked them to 10 rounds each and loaded the two rifles, one with each 10 round box of 124 grain JHP. I was still shooting 105 yards, so still 50 round boxes. With the first box of
